

Botswana

By Tom Kirvan

A JEWEL OF SOUTHERN AFRICA

Botswana, a landlocked country in Southern Africa, is home to approximately 2.4 million people, including 21-year-old track star Letsile Tebogo, who won the 200-meter sprint title at the Paris Olympics in August, becoming the first gold medalist from his native land.

Despite its relatively small population, Botswana is known for its political stability and strong sense of national identity. The majority of the population belongs to the Tswana ethnic group, while other groups include the Kalanga, Basarwa (San), and various smaller ethnic communities. English is the official language, used in government and education, while Setswana is the national language, spoken by the majority of the population. Botswana's population is concentrated in urban areas like Gaborone, Francistown, and Maun, while vast stretches of the country remain sparsely populated, particularly in the Kalahari Desert region.

Botswana spans an area of about 225,000 square miles, characterized by a variety of landscapes that include deserts, savannas, and wetlands. The Kalahari Desert, which covers much of the country, is one of Botswana's most defining geographic features. Despite its arid conditions, the Kalahari supports a unique ecosystem, with species such as the meerkat and gemsbok thriving in the region. In contrast, the Okavango Delta, a UNESCO World Heritage site, is a vast inland delta that creates a lush, green oasis in the northwestern part of the country. The delta is fed by seasonal rains, transforming the landscape into a haven for wildlife. Botswana's climate is generally semi-arid, with hot summers and mild winters, and the country experiences a rainy season from November to March.

Botswana's history is marked by its transition from a British protectorate to an independent and prosperous nation. The area now known as Botswana was originally inhabited by the San people, followed by the arrival of Bantu-speaking groups, including the Tswana, in the first millennium AD. In the late 19th century, the territory came under British protection as the Bechuanaland Protectorate, a status it maintained until gaining independence in 1966. Upon independence, Botswana faced significant challenges, including poverty and limited infrastructure, but under the leadership of its first president, Sir Seretse Khama, the country pursued policies that prioritized economic development and good governance. Today, Botswana is celebrated as one of Africa's most stable democracies and has made remarkable progress in areas such as education, health care, and economic growth.

Fast Facts

Capital: Gaborone

Population: 2.4 million

Primary Religion: Christianity

Economic engines: Diamond mining and eco-tourism

Must-see Attraction: Okavango Delta

Primerus Member: Brown and Company Attorneys

Brown and Company Attorneys, located in Gaborone, specialize in all facets of criminal defense work.

Botswana

Botswana has one of the highest per capita incomes in Africa, largely due to its rich natural resources, particularly diamonds. The discovery of diamonds in the 1960s transformed the country's economy, enabling significant investments in infrastructure, education, and social services. The diamond industry continues to be the backbone of the economy, accounting for a substantial portion of government revenue and export earnings. In addition to diamonds, Botswana's economy is supported by tourism, particularly eco-tourism centered around its wildlife and natural beauty. The agricultural sector, although small, remains important, with cattle farming being a traditional economic activity. Botswana also has made strides in diversifying its economy, with efforts to develop sectors such as financial services, technology, and manufacturing.

Gaborone, the capital city of Botswana, is also its most populous urban center, with over 230,000 people. Located near the country's southeastern border with South Africa, Gaborone is the political and economic heart of Botswana. The city is known for its modern infrastructure, government buildings, and vibrant business environment. Key landmarks include the National Assembly, the Botswana Stock Exchange, and the Gaborone Dam. Gaborone is also home to the University of Botswana and several cultural institutions, including the National Museum and Art Gallery.

Top 5 Must-See Tourist Destinations

- Okavango Delta: The Okavango Delta is one of the most extraordinary natural wonders in the world, and a UNESCO World Heritage site. This vast inland delta is a lush, green oasis that teems with wildlife, including elephants, lions, leopards, hippos, and a myriad of bird species. Visitors can explore the delta by traditional mokoro (dugout canoe), offering a unique and serene way to experience the landscape. The delta is also home to luxury lodges and camps, making it a premier destination for safari enthusiasts.
- Chobe National Park: Located in northern Botswana, Chobe National Park is renowned for its large elephant population, estimated to be more than 120,000. The park encompasses diverse habitats, including floodplains, woodlands, and the Chobe River, which attracts a variety of wildlife, particularly during the dry season. Chobe is one of the best places in Africa to see elephants in the wild, and visitors can enjoy boat cruises, game drives, and guided walks to observe the park's rich biodiversity, including lions, buffalos, and antelopes.

- Makgadikgadi Pans: The Makgadikgadi Pans, located in northeastern Botswana, are one of the largest salt flats in the world. This otherworldly landscape is the remnant of an ancient lake that dried up thousands of years ago. During the dry season, the pans are a vast, shimmering expanse of white, with little vegetation. However, after the rains, the area transforms into a lush habitat, attracting migratory birds, zebras, and wildebeests.
- Tsodilo Hills: Tsodilo Hills, located in northwestern Botswana, is a UNESCO World Heritage site known for its ancient rock art. The hills are considered sacred by the San people, and the area is often referred to as the "Louvre of the Desert" due to the thousands of rock paintings that adorn its cliffs. The art, which dates back thousands of years, depicts scenes of hunting, dancing, and animals, offering a glimpse into the lives and beliefs of the region's early inhabitants.
- Kgalagadi Transfrontier Park: Kgalagadi Transfrontier Park is a vast, cross-border conservation area shared by Botswana and South Africa characterized by red sand dunes, sparse vegetation, and a harsh, arid environment that is home to a variety of wildlife adapted to these conditions. Visitors to park can expect to see predators such as lions, cheetahs, and hyenas, as well as large herds of springbok and gemsbok.